A Famous African Explorer

WAS PIONEER OF
WESTERN AFRICA

James Pinckney the First Man to Penetrate Unknown Wilds of Niger River.

An interesting arrival on the Coptic, who is staying over here, is James Pinckney, of London and Liverpool, a merchant by profession, and a globe-trotter, hunter of lions and explorer by inclination. Mr. Pinckney is a unique Englishman, and his life has been thickly fraught with adventures.

He spent over forty years of his life in western tropical Africa engaged in developing commerce, and is today looked upon as one of the greatest living authorities upon all matters pertaining to that portion of the Dark Continent.

Pinckney was responsible for the opening up of the large tract of country watered by the Rio Forcados, one of the tributaries of the great Niger river, falling into the Gulf of Guinea in the Bight of Benin and Biafra. When he first started to explore this river he rigged up a small steamer with sheet iron as armor, packed some arms and six brass four-pounders aboard, and headed for the unknown.

After several months, during which time he was unheard of, he suddenly came to light again, having penetrated far into the interior and succeeded at the first attempt in bartering goods for ivory and the natural products of the country. This expedition opened up the Forcados to trade, and today the factory whistle is heard along its banks.

Pinckney of the late Sir Richard Burton explored the Niger beyond the Socotro country and by his discoveries regarding the course of the tributary of Benue, added considerably to geographical knowledge. He was the first man to establish a regular trading factory in the old Benin city, and his intimate acquaintance with the country and its people proved of great service to the British government.

Mr. Pinckney is now on a tour of the world. He left London last October, visiting the West Indies and Mexico and from there he came to Los Angeles. From San Francisco he came to Honolulu, and will shortly proceed on his journey around the globe. From here he goes to Samoa and other of the South Sea Islands. He is a friend of the widow of Robert Louis Stevenson, and is looking forward to visiting the old Stevenson home.

Though well advanced in years now, he cannot resist the fascinations of travel, and is as enthusiastic over his present tour as he was over his first trip of exploration.

Mr. Pinckney owns considerable stock in American, European and Mexican railroads. He has also heavily invested in a number of steamship lines. His brother-in-law, Sir Alfred L. Jones, is said to be the largest individual shipowner in the world.

German Criminologists.

Baron Von Keudel and Mr. George Cruzen, of Germany, passengers on the Gaelic, are completing a tour of the world. They have recently been in Japan on official business pertaining to the criminal departments of the German government. Baron Von Keudel was sent out from Germany to make an inspection of the prison system of Japan, while Mr. Cruzen performed a similar duty with the police departments. The two gentlemen were at the Hackfeld reception.
